- Obama judge: Injured cop can't sue Black Lives Matter
- Radical organization protected as "social movement"

By John Friend

In the wake of a string of violent and all too often fatal attacks on police officers across the country last year—attacks that were instigated by radical activists, subversive leftist organizations, and an entirely dishonest mainstream mass media—two separate lawsuits were filed on behalf of American law enforcement officials charging Black Lives Matter (BLM) and its top leaders with inciting, encouraging, and justifying the violence leveled against police.

In late September, however, a federal judge appointed by President Barack Obama shot down one of those suits, claiming that the group and its leaders cannot be sued because they are part of "a social movement" and are, ironically, engaging in free speech that is protected by the Constitution.

As this newspaper recently reported, an unnamed East Baton Rouge Parish sheriff's deputy sued

Left, officer Montrell Jackson is shown holding his child just a few months before the Baton Rouge policeman was gunned down by a man some say was inspired by Black Lives Matter (BLM) rhetoric. Above: Did Judge Brian Jackson give BLM a free pass to call for mass murder?

BLM and its most prominent leaders, including DeRay Mckesson, a national spokesman for the movement known for his incendiary and radical anti-American views, in the aftermath of an ambush on Louisiana police officers following the shooting death of Alton Sterling, a young black man. The lawsuit alleges that Mckesson and other BLM leaders, along with the overall Black Lives Matter movement, "caused or contributed to" the violence carried out against Baton Rouge law enforcement officers. BLM and its leaders incited and even justified the violence, the lawsuit contends.

Attorney Donna Grodner, who has thus far declined to comment to this reporter, filed the lawsuit on behalf of the sheriff's deputy. Grodner also filed a separate lawsuit on behalf of yet another police officer, charging BLM—funded by George Soros
