CULTURE WAR

• Parents rise up to challenge radical curricula in schools

By the AFP Staff

It's being called a parent revolution by some media outlets, as fathers and mothers storm school board meetings across the U.S. to object to the social engineering and brainwashing that their children endure every day in classrooms around the United States.

As readers will see in this week's issue of AFP, this very thing is happening all across America. It began a decade ago when young activists graduated from liberal arts schools in the U.S. They took jobs in education and ran for school boards, highlighting their bona fides in early child development and education. The problem is, they also brought with them their radical, far-left ideas, such as "equity" and Critical Race Theory (CRT), concepts that teach children that one group of people is destined to advance while another group is set to fail—all because of the color of their skin.

The tragedy is, CRT benefits no one except for its leading proponents, who have enriched themselves guilt-ing liberal elites into believing this hokum. Why would a poor, inner-city child try to better himself when he is repeatedly fed the lie that he is destined for failure because the system is against him solely because he is black or brown?

As readers will see, these revolutionary parents are not just fighting for their children. They are doing this for the very future of our country. They have been called crazy and even labeled extremists and terrorists by the federal government and the mainstream media, yet they have persisted and are beginning to see major victories that include exposing the push for radical, destructive school curricula and are even overturning school board decisions.

A mom in Virginia, who fled communist China to raise her family in the United States, laid it out for America, explaining how she grew up in China and saw firsthand how radical, far-left ideologues can bring a country to ruin.

"When I was in China, I spent my entire school years in the Chinese Cultural Revolution, so I'm very, very familiar with the communist tactics of how to divide people, how they canceled the Chinese traditional culture and destroyed our heritage," Virginia mom Xi Van Fleet told Fox News reporter Matt Leach on Oct. 13.

"All this is happening here in America," she concluded. "They call(ed) them racists for a long time, but that did not work, so they have to upgrade to domestic terrorists." ★
