Story of the Year

- Evidence indicates FBI could have prevented Jan. 6

By the AFP Staff

Over the past two years, the mainstream media and the Deep State have led Americans to believe that hundreds, if not thousands, of violent, crazed rioters stormed the U.S. Capitol on Jan. 6, 2021, in berserker fashion at the behest of former President Donald Trump, hunting down senators and congressmen before attempting to stop legislators from carrying out their sacred duty to certify the 2020 national election results.

What is left out of this narrative, however, constitutes the biggest revelation of 2022: U.S. law enforcement—most notably the FBI—had more than a dozen informants in the key groups that marched on the Capitol that day, including six operatives inside the group known as the OathKeepers, whose leader, Stewart Rhodes, was just convicted of seditious conspiracy.

For those who don't know, seditious conspiracy is a crime which involves plotting against the authority of the state. A more detailed explanation can be found on pages 6-7 in this week's issue by Maryland attorney Glenn Allen, which details the absurdity of the charges filed against Exuberant protesters got a bit carried away on Jan. 6, 2021, many entering the Capitol. But how much were they egged on by FBI informants, and how many informants were in the crowd that day?

Rhodes and one other member of the OathKeepers, a conservative organization made up of former law enforcement officers and military men that seeks to preserve the Constitution of the United States.

Even though Rhodes never set foot on the grounds of the U.S. Capitol building, a jury in Washington, D.C. still found him guilty of this crime based on, among other things, videos that showed him legally purchasing firearms and storing them in Virginia.

Central to his prosecution was the fact that the FBI had at least six informants among Rhodes and other members of OathKeepers, who supposedly had only been documenting everything the OathKeepers were saying and doing and then reporting those details back to their FBI handlers.

Americans should be highly skeptical of FBI claims, especially since revelations concerning FBI involvement in another high-profile case—the attempted kidnapping of Michigan Gov. Gretchen Whitmer—came to light earlier this year.

For those who don't remember, last April, a Michigan judge excoriated FBI officials for the role they played in driving the plot to kidnap the governor. In that case, defense attorneys for a group of men accused of conspiring to kidnap Whitmer re-
