Was next president chosen at Bilderberg 2017?

By Mark Anderson

Unprincipled political ladder-climbers lucky enough to get the coveted “Bilderberg boost” tend to clear any remaining hurdles between them and high office.

Take Bill Clinton, whose attendance at the 1991 Bilderberg meeting in Baden-Baden, Germany “coincidentally” presaged “Slick Willie”—already tainted from a string of apparent crimes and scandals as Arkansas’s governor—still managing against all odds to clinch the presidency. He became one of the most scandal-ridden national leaders in U.S. history, starting in 1992.

For two terms, the American people were saddled with everything from Chinagate, to the Monica Lewinsky White House sex scandal, to a resulting Clinton impeachment, to the strange July 1993 death of longtime friend of the Clintons and White House deputy counsel Vince Foster, found dead at a Virginia federal park in what honest probes showed to be a staged “suicide.”

But is another “Clintonista” regime in the making? Consider Virginia governor and Clinton pal Terry McAuliffe (D) and his attendance at the 2017 Bilderberg meeting in Chantilly, Va.

A longtime friend of the Clintons, McAuliffe broke bread with the Bilderbergers for the first time June 1-4. Within a few days, he caught the nation off guard when he floated the idea that he would like to seek the 2020 presidency—at an eerily early juncture only seven months into President Donald Trump’s first term.

Gov. McAuliffe’s attendance at Bilderberg has led some to believe he may be on the global elite’s radar.

Call it mere chance, but on June 5, the day after Bilderberg concluded, McAuliffe also announced that Virginia and 12 other states “have formed an alliance to move forward on the principles of the Paris Climate Agreement, despite Trump’s decision to withdraw the federal government from the accord,” according to a news release from the governor’s office.

The Bilderberg cabal champions the “climate change” agenda since it helps monopolize natural resources management and brings forth untold billions in profits.

The Washington journal Politico noted: “McAuliffe still talks to Bill Clinton every day, sometimes several times a day. They’ve talked in passing about a White House run. The former president has said he’s supportive of whatever his friend does.”

“I’m trying to run a progressive state, putting progressive values out there. At the same time, making sure
